Communities: The lowest level of geographic disaggregation that we are using for this project. This should count the number of communities, rather than listing them.

Participants: People who participate directly in program interventions (i.e. take trainings, are active in groups supported by the program).

Direct Beneficiaries: People who benefit either materially or in knowledge/access, due to program activities (generally the household members of participants). This would also include people who use services (such as credit or SGBV response services).

Indirect Beneficiaries: People who don't derive any specific benefit from the program, but who benefit from awareness-raising (media campaigns) or from living in communities that are improved (i.e. communities with stronger resilience due to increased biodiversity, estimated number of people who have access to locally adapted seeds through seed fairs where participants participated, etc.).

Groups: These are generally groups for participants/direct beneficiaries that are directly supported by the program or who gain some benefit (resources, training) from the program.

Intermediaries: People who are trained or strengthened in capacity/resources in order to provide benefit to the ultimate target group (i.e. service providers, agricultural extension workers.

Institutions: These are government or civil society organizations that we may engage to strengthen community capacity or services or for other program needs.
